Healthcare workers are at high risk of infection with the hepatitis B virus (HBV). Our objective was to characterize nurses' attitudes and knowledge about HBV and examine how that relates to their likelihood to adhere to universal precautions. A cross-sectional national survey of all US nurses. Nurses in seven major nursing specialties, including 314 disease control and public health nurses, were surveyed by self-administered postal mail survey using a 35-item questionnaire. The response rate was 41%. Overall, the response rate was very high, although only 44% of nurses surveyed participated in the actual survey. Overall, nurses' attitudes and knowledge were found to be generally positive. Less than one-third reported a recent infection with HBV, a higher proportion than that reported in the general US population. Respondents were generally aware of the method of transmission and high-risk groups, but responses regarding the transmission of HBV from an infected source to a healthy carrier or from healthy donor to an infected recipient were more varied, with many respondents incorrectly identifying the two possibilities. Overall, the strongest determinants of the likelihood that nurses would report a practice consistent with universal precautions were clinical experience, belief that HBV infection could be transmitted by kissing, and lack of concern about HBV infection. Nurses had generally positive attitudes about HBV infection, including concern about the impact of infection on their patients. However, nurses' responses regarding the routes by which HBV is transmitted were highly variable and less consistent with universal precautions recommendations.open Core_kernel open! Import (*
